Talking with staff
If you need to take a break from school, miss class frequently, or struggle to complete schoolwork, contact your school to discuss these situations. Depending on the school, you may need to talk with the registrar, your advisor, instructors and/or professors. If possible, the best time to discuss the issues or options listed below is before treatment begins and before returning to school after a long absence:

• Attendance, since you may need to miss days or classes for treatment and appointments
• Any accommodations you might need such as fewer classes, a shortened school day, a closer parking space, or additional time to complete assignments or tests
• Some hospitals have educational coordinators or social workers who can meet with staff to explain your situation and needs.
• If possible, ask your doctor to give you an estimate for how long and how often you may be away from school.

Keeping up with schoolwork
• You may expect yourself to keep up with the demand of school or to resume school at the level you did before cancer. Going to school may be tiring during and after cancer. Take it easy at first and don’t overdo things. Your health is the most important priority. Be aware of your body’s energy level and take breaks, or delay restarting some activities until your energy level improves. Sometimes talking through your responsibilities and expectations with another person can help you re-prioritize your tasks.
• If you find that school is harder than it used to be or you have more difficulty keeping up with your schoolwork, ask for help. Some cancers and treatments can affect your ability to concentrate, your memory, your ability to understand reading material or your ability to put thoughts together. Some of these challenges may be temporary, or some may last longer. Not everyone will have difficulties with learning during and after cancer treatment, but if you notice differences talk with your doctor about your concerns and talk to your school about possible options to make school possible for you.
